Ethical fashion guide faq

Short answer: They're not! For THE COVID Fashion Report, all companies have been assessed on information published on the company's website or brands, company reports (e.g. Annual Report, Corporate Social Responsibility Report), and any relevant national statements (e.g. Modern Slavery Statement) that directly cover the period since the spread of the COVID-19 outbreak. All companies are also given the opportunity to provide evidence directly to the research team. Approximately 2/3 of the companies assessed (67%) provide additional evidence. Where companies have been evaluated on public information only, this is identified in the Brand Report and Seller with an asterisk (*) next to their name. Companies may prefer to publicly disclose their supply chain management practices, rather than answering our research (for example they may be reviewed by various research projects or they may prefer a single public disclosure, rather than reveal through a survey). By evaluating companies on publicly available information, we may provide appropriate credit to these efforts. In our research history, non-responsive companies have received various grades based on publicly available information. In the context of COVID-19, we recognise that various factors may have contributed to the comprehensive evidence provided by the company - from barriers created by staff bloating or legal requirements for companies trading in administration, to companies that may have taken more intentional decisions to ignore their supply chain responsibilities. Therefore, it is important to note that the ratings provided in the Report reflect the actions proved. We recognize that some companies may have carried out positive actions that are not shown in our assessment, as they are not proved. While any positive actions that contribute to the economic dignity and well-being of the workers should be celebrated; transparency and visibility of this action is critical because it is the only way to ensure accountability for shipping. Our print guide has been out and about since February 2008 and at that time we had great feedback. Most have been positive, with most major criticisms being from people who - like us - are committed to 'significant change' and thinking that we are not far enough. We are encouraged by people who use the guide, but even more so by people who actually ask questions about why certain products are judged on others, and give feedback given what they know. We have tried to give adequate answers to these questions and others that have come to us. How can you have 'Ethical' supermarket? Isn't this a 'oxymoron' given the big and general practice of supermarket exploitation, especially in Australia? According to Wikipedia, consumerism/ ethical shopping are: buy things that are made ethically. Generally, this means harmless to or exploited human, animal or environmental. Whether this is Ever achieved by shopping in supermarkets for mass-produced goods, as part of a system where profits are the main motivation, is certainly the main question. Keep in mind that the goal of this guide is to reach mainstream audiences with some new criteria to buy their daily needs. Many people use supermarkets and will continue to do so, so we look forward to introducing them to a number of criteria alongside 'cost' and 'convenience' which is the main driver of most purchases. I first admitted it was a very 'light-green' approach, and we saw it as a starting place for people. I recommend that the way of life is more ethical is to start engaging with issues one by one, and then changing your behavior to reflect a responsible approach. Ultimately this may mean avoiding the supermarket completely, which will be ideal - now it's a place we encourage people to move towards. The first step is to ask do I need this product? Why are you focusing on 'company records'? Isn't this just a criterion among many? Can you rank to products based on their features as well as their company's track record? The focus of the guide is on the company's track record. It is one aspect of the whole product picture that is 'not on the label'. Some of the criteria that need to be used when looking for more ethical purchases are outlined in the guide center (and here) and throughout it as information blurbs. We want to be more comprehensive covering their products and features, and this is the goal of a wider project. However, this is a huge task given the large number of products - each with a wide variety of features. We've worked to deal with it with the star 'Stellar product features' - giving it priority; and also indicates common characteristics for the type of product. We are looking for people who are interested in helping in developing project content. Isn't the rating system a little simple? This guide depends on information from secondary sources, which may not be compatible with each other! It is a very simple rating system. We recommend avoiding companies that have a negative record, and then choosing the best of those that are recalled. At the most basic level we are just trying to give people the tools to help in making better choices - a way of distinguishing priorities. It is true that such comparisons compare 'apples' with 'oranges' because ratings are calculated from assessments covering various ethical considerations. Given this we encourage users to use ratings for broad comparisons, but also follow the assessment links to the resources own, and shop according to what they value. We are working on a system to enable users to filter results etc. 'adjust' ratings to better match what they value. See an example with Electronics here. Unfortunately some large companies seem to be judging well, given their resources to put in place sustainability measures. These are different Methodology. We would recommend buying from smaller local businesses in priority to larger foreign-owned ones. What is your definition of Australian-owned? Our definition of 'Australian-owned' is more than 50% owned by an Australian-based organization. This relates to where companies are registered and where they pay taxes. The Australian-based subsidiary of a foreign-owned company is not 'Australian-owned'. By supporting Australian-owned businesses on foreign-owned businesses, we channel money into the local economy (Australia) rather than abroad. This supports infrastructure here. Moreover, operations in Australia are more likely to comply with the need for fair pay and conditions. What are your criteria for entering products in the guide? Basically they are 'common brands' available in major grocery stores, such as supermarkets. Why don't you include a supermarket home brand? We do not cover home brands throughout our guide because it is very difficult to find good/comprehensive information on who is producing certain home brand products. The best we've come across is the general directory, directory of the Private Label Manufacturers Association, which is a list of companies and services that meet personal label requirements. It gives some indication of who the main supplier is. If we list a home brand throughout our product schedule, the same brand will appear again and again. Using our current methodology the brand will be listed under Woolworths or Coles (Wesfarmers). Coles and Woolworths both received criticism for possessing poker machines, among others. See more at supermarkets in Australia. You can find our listing of all the major supermarket home brands here. Generally we don't recommend home brands because they (1) don't disclose who supplies the products - you don't know 'where your dollars are going', and (2) channel money to the hypermark chain. Australia has one of the most concentrated retail markets internationally, with two key players, Coles and Woolworths, accounting for more than 80% of Australian retail sales. Home brands are the cheapest yet cheapest option always comes at a cost to growers (See Four Corners of 'Prices we pay', August 2008). We encourage support for local manufacturers where possible. Sometimes when options are limited, home brands may be the best alternative. If you buy a home brand, and if supporting local manufacturing in Australia or reducing your food rock is important to you, we recommend you check out the home brand label to see where it is made and choose 'Australian Products' as the best option, 'Made in Australia' as the next best, and 'imported' as the last option. We are considering ways to make our position the home brand is clearer. How do you evaluate companies in relation to animal testing? Any company listed on the List of Companies performing tests on animals receives full criticism. Any company listed in the FREE list of PETA cruelty. Select Select Free or Bunny Jump receives full praise. Why don't you include animal welfare concerns related to dairy farming (such as bobby calves) as 'Industry Signals'? Common industry practice in the dairy industry is sending boys to slaughter at the age of five days. The practice has been criticised by animal welfare groups and has gone into the media late with the RSPCA's campaign against industry proposals to let calves head for slaughter go unsuspecting as a means of cost cutting (Weekly Times, SMH). Learn more at the RSPCA - What happens to Bobby Calves. Other concerns relate to the removal of calves from their mothers, which are also part of standard industry practices and in the system now essential for dairy production. We have marked the issue of bobby calves on the comparison pages of the type of products for products that are mostly dairy (butter, cheese, milk, milk powder, milk-flavored milk, yogurt, ice cream, cottage cheese, cream custard) but not flagged this as Industry Warning. We can go either way but with the goal of introducing issues in a way that allows people to take one issue at a time and dairy to be a big part of the daily food of people we have chosen to note, but not stress it as An Industry Warning. If this issue is important to you, we recommend choosing products from companies that have animal welfare on their agenda, such as of course a great option to avoid many issues related to dairy farming is by going dairy-free. If you think about going vegan, remember to pay special attention to getting iron, calcium, vitamin D, and vitamin B12 in your diet. Here are some product alternatives from Animals Australia. I heard the 'X' product contains palm oil. Why don't they receive criticism for this? Due to insufficient labelling laws and the lack of comprehensive information on products containing palm oil, we do not provide criticism for palm oil use. It is not always easy to identify products with palm oil. Under the Australian food standard New Zealand needs, it is sufficient to have vegetable oil in the list of ingredients on the packet, although the product contains palm oil. As a rule, if the content of saturated fats is about 50%, there is a good chance that vegetable oils will actually become palm oil. If we add criticism to all companies that have palm oil in their products, almost every company will get a cross, making it difficult to distinguish between companies on other issues. (For example in margarine, Melrose is the only one who does not have palm oil derivatives). In years These pairs of palm oil scorecards have been published by various NGOs (WWF, Rainforest Foundation UK, Greenpeace and Union of Concerned Scientists). These have all been included in our company's valuation data and they contribute to the company's ratings. The best sources for finding products that do not contain palm oil are the Application of Palm Oil Investigation, and You buy the responsible section on the Australian BOS website at www.orangutans.com.au Learn more about the RSPO (Roundtable on Sustainable Palm Oil) and its signatories, including Unilever, H.J. Heinz, Nestlé, Johnson & Johnson and Cadbury. See more. Note that the RSPO has been criticised by many groups including friends of the Earth as a way to make the palm oil industry look 'responsible' or 'sustainable' without reducing deforestation. ... it does not stop the expansion of damaging oil palm plantations and it does not benefit the local community. Basically it failed to address the cause of palm oil problems - Earth International Agrofuel Campaign Coordinator Torry Kuswardono of Indonesia. Why Ethics Consumer Group works with Mobile Outware in Ethical Stores! iPhone app? For several years we have been asked by people if the app for mobile devices is in the pipeline. In the mid-2009 Outware Mobile approached we had used print and web guides and, after several discussions, offered to build an application as a collaborative project (our data, the development of their applications) without front charges. We see this as a way to make guidance available to people in new ways, and also give these relatively new business opportunities to showcase their skills in a positive way. It has been observed that Outware Mobile produced an iPhone app for the Melbourne Spring Racing Carnival, commissioned by News Limited. Mobile outware points out that 'the SuperRacing app is not a gambling app but rather a form guide for spring racing carnival racing. Apple doesn't allow gambling apps into appstores'. Where is $5 applicable for your Store Ethics! application go to? Apple/Google takes 30%, as they do for all paid apps, app developers (Outware) get 35%, and we (Ethical User Groups) get the remaining 35%. Although we want to create an Ethical Shop! free applications, we need to charge for it because it is one of our main sources of income, along with print guide sales. This income allows us to continue doing what we do, and be independent of commercial interests. We also consider it a reasonable amount considering it's a one-time purchase and the nature of the guide is 'exploring the actual cost of our daily purchase'. purchase.
